Excerpt: . . . hardware industry of Birmingham, embracing the production of almost all possible goods in copper, iron, gold, silver, steel, electro-plate, tin, bronze, and c. , as well as in the locksmiths and nailmakers workshops of the Wolverhampton district and in the cutlery manufactories of Sheffield, the small-trade system is still practised to a large extent, thus, by the employment of children and long working hours, competing with the larger manufactories; so that small workshops and imperfect machinery naturally resulted in an irregular division of time and a longer days work. Fatal lung diseases, caused by the inhalation of metal dust in non-ventilated workshops, moral depravity, and total ignorance of the generally underpaid youthful operatives, are the melancholy characteristics noticeable in these districts. Since the inquiry of 1842, there has indeed been some improvement, especially in the Wolverhampton district; but the replies to the questions of...
