Not illustrated. 1895 Excerpt: . manger, this being passed through between the board and the rail, which is shown in section. The last of the three illustrations, Fig. 17, represents a manger of a very superior and costly kind, which, it must be admitted, is very seldom met with except in model buildings and at home farms, where the best appearance is required. It consists of a front and back of brown glazed earthenware blocks, each about twelve inches in width and in height, with ends and divisions made to match; and when fixed in cement they also make excellent water-troughs. The width therefore of this manger is two feet, and it is hardly necessary to point out that it can be arranged for taking the food supply in the same manner as shown and described for the preceding figure. The best height for a manger is no doubt a medium one, say about 1 ft. 9 in. from the ground line to the top of it; and the backs should always have a sufficient slope to allow of enough space for the horns of animals when feeding. If this is neglected, imperfectly cleared-out mangers is the result. Any remarks on the fitting up of cow-houses will not be complete without a reference to the stall divisions, or travises as they are sometimes called. The custom of some particular districts dispenses with them, but generally speaking they are required, and the advantages attending their adoption are of some weight. At...
