Excerpt: . . . who, superior to general prejudice, was willing to seek fur information through a medium by which few other nations of the East will condescend to accept of knowledge, however beneficial the attainment might prove td themselves. t Whatever might have been their separate sentiments, the ultimate decision was temperate and wise. I was apprised, late on the evening of the 28th, by a verbal communication from the Maywoon of Pegue, that on the day appointed for the delivery of the reply to the Governor-generals letter, I should be formally received at the palace of the king, who would grant me a personal audience in the character to which I laid claim, and that the propositions which I had suggested, for the regulation and encouragement of commerce, had for the most part received his. majestys approbation. I expressed, in answer, the satisfaction I felt from...
